

The Reef at Night

When the sun slipped under the water, the reef began to glow. Tiny lanternfish drifted between the corals like sparks from a campfire. Nila held her breath and counted them, one by one, until she lost track somewhere past thirty.

Her father said the reef was oldest thing either of them would ever touch. Nila believed him. It felt patient, the way mountains feel patient.